An Alteged Expose of Masonry, An Alteged Expose of Masonry.

Five auxious-looking elderly maidens and fifteen investigating, austere men were attracted to Kindergarten hall hat evening by the announcement that an expose of the socrets of Free Masonry would take place. At 7:30 o'clock, the bour announced for the show to begin, a mointcholy-visaged, cross-cyed individual, wearing a pair of goggles, invited the assembly to prayer, after which he stated that his mane was Michael, that he belonged to Philadelphia, was a free methodist and proposed to expose Masonry, because it imposed upon the people. He announced further that he would give no experiments, but would content himself with preaching a short sermon. This talk did not suit the audience, and they one by one slipped out, leaving the sermon. Ford's Opera House—The Galley Stave."

This, which is probably the very best of the plays which Mr. Bartley Campbell has written, had its second representation this season at Ford's opera-loose last night. The construction of the play and its many excelences have already been alieded to in these columns before, and it only remains now to state that the present drama is improved most decidedly from the play that was first pre-sented under this title. Its construction as at present shown proves that Mr. Campbell has carefully eliminated everything that formerly marred its perfection, and it is now formerly marred lis perfection, and it is now a complete and perfect play. It is full of dramatic incident and situation, and the dislegue is bright, crisp and attractive. Mr. Campbell, if he had written no other play but "The Galley Slave," would inve stamped himself as a dramatist who theroughly understands stage effect, and who has the happy faculty of drawing his characters so sharply true to nature that their presentation elicits a vital interest. Of all American dramatists Mr. Bartley Campbell stands decidedly in the front rank, and his plays show a keeper insight into character and a more alsoner insight into character. a keener imight into character and a more complete knowledge of dramatic force than any native author who has yet made his appearance. The unities of plot and the successful working up of dramatic climaxes are the distinguishing features of the construction of the "Galley Slave," and the representation of this drama by the company now performing at the overshouse is so energing and famous love dust from "Paul and Virginia." The other selections will be equally attractive. The attendance should show that Mr. Morsell is very pleasantly remembered in this city, where, before his departure for Europe, his voice was ever at the disposal of every local charity.
